NOTE FROM THE PASTOR:

Dear Parishioners:

David Mills reflects upon the loss of his pet in “Missing Moby: On Losing a Faithful Companion.” (Aleteia.org, 15 November 2017). He writes:

“Sunday began like any Sunday, except that I slept a little later than usual and woke to a lovely fall day. It ended with my sitting cross-legged on the floor of Exam Room # 2, holding my dog Moby’s head in my lap, with our two youngest children on either side of him, my son burying his face in the crook of his arm, as the vet put him to sleep. He had gotten sick without warning the day before and then got worse. Just a few days before he’d been happily chasing a tennis ball I threw. The vet at the only veterinarian open on Sunday ran the tests and said he was very sick but she didn’t know why. Care would cost thousands we don’t have, and might not work, and if it worked would give him only an extra year or so. I had to tell her to put him to sleep.

I’m glad he had his head in my lap when he died, that I was holding him one last time and was the one who had him when he left this world. But I’ll never forget how he turned to look at the vet as she put the needle into the catheter they already had in his leg, and then put his head back down on my lap, and how his eyes closed within a couple of seconds, and then how she took the stethoscope from around her neck and held it to his chest for four or five seconds, and I began to think, ‘Maybe it didn’t work, maybe ...,’ and she pulled it away and said, ‘He’s passed.’ I had loved that dog from the moment I walked round a corner at the Humane Society and saw him lying in his pen on his pillow looking at me. He loved me the same way.

Today, Tuesday, is no less painful. When I woke up in the middle of the night, I started to roll over and reach down to the floor to pet him, till I remembered he wasn’t there, and never would be again. I walk into the study and looked at the couch to talk to him as I’ve done several times a day for the last twelve years, and I get out three or four words before I see that it’s empty, and know it’ll always be empty. I hear dog tags jingle and a head shake and my heart leaps for half a second till I realize I’m hearing our daughter’s dog we’re watching while she’s away.

Yesterday we buried Moby. Our youngest,

Jonathan, and I had dug the grave during the day. It took a long time to dig a deep enough hole through the hard white clay. We dug it nestled against the wall a few feet from my study window, where I can see it when I’m sitting at my computer. Jonathan and I carried the paper coffin in which the veterinarian had put Moby up from the basement and around the house to the grave. It was a kind of procession, and we both walked very slowly without having intended to. [Daughters] Hope and Hannah were waiting by the grave. We lowered Moby into the grave using ropes because it seemed more dignified and fitting than wrestling with a flimsy paper coffin. We all said a few words about Moby, then said an Our Father and Hail Mary in thanksgiving for his life. I could only get out about three words of each prayer. We each threw a shovel of dirt into the grave, then the children and I finished filling it in. I put in the last shovelful that covered the coffin. Because we live next to a woods, Jonathan and I carried some big heavy flat rocks from the rock wall we’d built years ago to cover the top of the grave. Wild animals don’t respect death and loss. We turned to walk back inside, and that, finally, was that.

It’s a tiny loss, even a trifling loss, in a world filled with such pain as this one. I lost a dog. People lose husbands and wives, son and daughters, their own lives. I’ve lost my parents and only sibling. But Moby’s death is the loss and pain I feel now, and it’s bitter. I loved that dog. I pray that he will be one of things Jesus will make new. I want to see him again, resplendently transfigured, though I’d cry with joy to see him again as he was.”

In this month of November, we prayerfully recall in a special way all of our loved ones who have passed. What is to stop us from remembering our deceased pets? The Church has no official teaching that says animals do or do not inherit eternal life. I myself prefer to believe that they do—because of Jesus. His victory was and will be so complete that all of creation will share in it, except, of course, those who have refused His mercy on the way to perdition. It was Jesus who made the bold (and utterly veracious) claim: Behold I make all things new. (Rev 21:5). All things made new. . . resplendently transfigured . . . even our beloved pets.

God Bless You!

Father Eric
